Get off of Microsoft's back.

Please end your never-ending, apparently obsessive, interest in the Microsoft case. You've done enough. Send your people after someone -- or something -- of consequence. Prosecuting a business, simply because the business is successful, provides a large group of -- otherwise (possibly/probably) unemployable -- attorneys with ample, overpaid, employment and on-the-job training. But it serves very little, if any, meaningful purpose. Microsoft does more good for the United States of America, by sheer accident -- in one week, than your organization does, with hundreds of overpaid bureaucrats, working around the clock, in 20 years.

Buy your staff some pool tables and foosball machines, and keep them busy with those interests and activities. By giving them anything else to do -- you are taking the risk of doing much harm. I am proud of what Microsoft has done for society -- and for the entire world. I am not at all proud of what you people do -- either for a living or as a potential benefit to society. In fact, what you do for a living is kind of embarrassing. Try looking for some honest -- and meaningful and productive -- work. There must be something that you can do.
